PRESIDENT HOOSEVELT

Mr. Roosevelt is an inveterate theater-goer, says a writer in the Theater Magazine for May. When he can spare the time rarely a week passes that the President does not see a play. Mrs. Roosevelt and the family generally contrive to see everything worth seeing, and frequently attend the theater without the President, who may be detained at the White House on some important business of state. Says the

When Secretary Loeb calls up one the Washington theaters and says tha the President would like to see the per formance, the management at on sends tickets for a stage box, and the withdraws from sale all the tickets the box or boxes immediately adjoining the President's box. These additions boxes may be sold to persons know to the management, but they are not o sale to the general public. If no one sufficient importance appears to pur chase them, they may be given to on of the secret service men who alway come to the theater with the President For, no matter where Mr. Roosevel goes, he is followed by the secret ser vice men. Personally, he dislikes very much to have them accompany him to the theater, but the chief of the secret service bureau in Washington has very

It is, therefore, an utter impossibility for any stranger to come very close President at close range. But scattered in these seats, directly in front of the President's box, a keen observer would find seven or eight athletic looking men, each of whom had bought his ticket at the box office, and had specified the location wanted. These men are all secret service men, acting without even the knowledge of Mr. Roose. velt himself, but certain to see that no suspicious person gets near the President's box. In the aisles leading to the boxes, and even upon the stage itself, secret service men are stationed. In two of the Washington theaters there are doors leading from the stage into the approach behind the President's box, and these doors are carefully guarded each time the President attends the theater, in order that no crank can enter the theater from the stage. Chief Wilkie remembers that when the tragedy occurred in Ford's theater, which cost Lincoln his life, the assassin was himself an actor, who obtained admission behind the scenes, because of his connection with the profession, and was enabled to approach the President's box from the stage without arousing suspicion. Nothing of that kind is ever going to happen again, if the secret service men can prevent it by adopting precautions.

When the President goes to the theater he uses the White House cartiage. Long before he arrives, how-SEATTLE AND TACOMA TO ever, the secret service men have gathered in the lobby, and from the time the doors are first opened two or three of the men stand by the ticket taker and carefully scrutinize every person entering the theater. Even the entrance to the gallery is watched, and any person who may arouse suspicion is quietly told to go to the office and get his money back. In this way the character of the audience is made safe to a reasonable degree. The President is usually late in coming to the theater, for his departure is timed accurately, and he wishes to arrive just after the curtain has risen. This means about twenty minutes after 8 in Washington. By that time most of the audience is seated and the crowd in the lobby is smallest. Very often, however, the crowd has heard informally that the President is coming, and waits in the lobby to see him. When the White House carriage arrives the secret service men hastily form a passageway, and the President and his party quick> ly enter the theater. President Roosevelt is partial to musical comedies. When Fritzi Scheff played "Mile. Modiste" in Washington, he was present with Mrs. Roosevelt the opening night, and liked it so much that he attended the performance a second time, when the singer returned to Washington. Mrs. Roosevelt has seen Fritzi Scheff in "Mlle. Modiste" three times. When the President saw her the second time, he sent for her between the acts, and she met him in the ante-room behind the stage box, adjoining the stage. She was in the piquant, short-skirted costume she wears while singing the drum song, and had the drum with her at the time. The President and Mrs. Roosevelt were much charmed by the little Austrian's captivating ways. The President is practically the only official in Washington who receives theater courtesies. Unlike Edward VII., who always pays for his theater seats, Mr. Roosevelt is always "the guest" of the management. It has been customary for many years for the White House to give a polite intima-AND PIANO MOVING, STORAGE, tion to the theaters whenever the President desired the courtesies of the house. It is possible that Mr. Roosevelt does not know that his tickets are not paid for, as the arrangements are always made by Mr. Loeb, or one of the White House ushers.
